A Continuation of The Critical Review of the publick buildings, &c. examined, by Mr. HIRAM.

XIII. THE church of St. Stephens Walbrook, built by Sir CHRISTOPHER WREN, is certainly the moſt elegant edifice of its magnitude he ever deſigned. And indeed I much doubt, with the Critic, whether 'Italy itſelf can produce 'any modern building of the like dimenſions, that can 'vie with this'. 'There is not, he ſays, a beauty which 'the plan would admit of, that is not to be found here 'in its greateſt perfection': but I think one, and that a very material one, is wanting, namely, the entrance ſhould have been with a grand portico, on that ſide next Stocks-market. Had that been executed, and the New Bank been placed on the one ſide; the intended houſe for the lord mayor, on the other; the market removed to Fleet-ditch; that lump of ſtone made for JOHN SOBIESKI, king of Poland, and ſet up by the citizens in honour of their king, but to their own diſgrace, converted into pavement; and the ſtatue of the ever glorious WILLIAM III. erected in the center of that area; had, I ſay, all this been effected, this place would have been the real center of beauty to the city, as our Critic terms it. But to have erected thoſe buildings on each ſide, and let the church remain as it is, the whole would have made a very indifferent figure.

But however grand ſuch a deſign might have been, it is now too late, ſince the Bank is rebuilt in another place; and therefore to make the beſt of a bad market, I ſhall conſider the whole for the lord mayor's palace only. — As London is the capital city of the world, certainly this palace ſhould be (of the kind) the moſt magnificent, elegant, and rich. To deſcribe the manner in which I would expreſs the magnificence, elegancy, and riches of this city, by the external and internal parts of this intended edifice, would be a means of furniſhing ſome perſons with ideas, which they would probably afterwards claim for their own. And indeed, as the deſigns of buildings, and their effects, cannot be ſo well underſtood by verbal deſcription, as by real plans, elevations, and ſections, lineally deſcribed, I ſhall therefore forbear giving any ſuch deſcription; eſpecially ſince, very ſhortly, I ſhall preſent the right hon. the lord mayor and court of aldermen, with a plan, elevation and ſection for that building; which I make no doubt, but thoſe gentlemen, like the noble and virtuous old Romans, will impartially conſider.

Before I go to Bow ſteeple, which comes the next in order, I muſt beg leave to take a ſtep to view the eaſt end of the church of St. Lawrence by Guildhall; which, one would imagine, our Critic had never ſeen. — This front of the chancel-end is of the Corinthian order, divided into three principal parts; of which the middlemoſt projects before thoſe of the extreams, and is divided by four columns, ſtanding on a continued pedeſtal, ſuſtaining a noble pediment. To theſe columns are affixed the pillaſters, impoſts, and architraved arches of the order, finely executed, and very much enriched with feſtoons of fruits, &c. admirably done. Within the middle arch is one ſpacious window, which illuminates the chancel; and in the other arches, two niches, but without ſtatues. The extream principal parts, are each bounded by two pillaſters, between which are niches as aforeſaid. In ſhort, I am ſurprized, that our Critic could go to Guildhall, to engage the two giants there, and not caſt one ſingle glance on this magnificent front.

XIV. Bow-ſteeple is a maſter-piece of its kind, and a delightful piece of beauty, not abſurdity, as Mr. Critic calls it. Did he know how many of its diameters are contained in the height of its tower, (which, of itſelf, is truly beautiful, independent of the curious ſpire which riſes from it;) the proportion which the ſpire bears to the tower; nay, did he know but the conſtruction of one ſingle column; he would not have had the aſſurance to have ſayed, that 'it is not to be reduced to any ſettled 'laws of beauty'. For in all the city, there is not any piece of architecture more regularly juſt: and by all real judges, it is eſteemed one of the moſt magnificent ſtructures of the kind in the known world.

XV. Not far from this, is St. Antholins in Watling-ſtreet, a building not much inferiour to it; and whoſe church differs from that of St. Stephen's Walbrook, in that St. Stephen's hath a ſpacious ſpherical dome, finely enriched with compartiments, feſtoons, &c. ſupported by eight Corinthian columns; and this church an elliptical dome, with fewer ornaments, ſupported in like manner by compoſite columns. The tower to this church, ſupports a lofty ſpire, crowned with an Ionic capital; a manner of finiſhing not to be produced in any other building about this city, and which is both elegant and magnificent.

Whilſt I've been here doing the buſineſs of our Critic, in giving ſome few remarks on this church and ſpire, he has advanced to the church in Foſter-lane, where he is amuſing himſelf with the pyramid it forms, and the juſt, and well proportioned ſimplicity of all its parts. —— The learned M. PERAULT, in the end of his Treatiſe on the five orders, tranſlated by Mr JOHN JAMES of Greenwich, has demonſtrated, that nothing can be ſo abſurd in building, as to place ſquare columns in ſuch a manner, as to interſect each other's ſolids; or, in plainer terms, to cut away half, or more, of the ſolidity of one; to make way for the ſolid ſpace of the other; as when half pillaſters ſtand on each ſide of whole pillaſters, &c. In this very manner, are placed all the pillaſters which form the ſpire or ſteeple of the church in Foſter-lane, which our Critic calls juſt and well proportioned; whereby the angles are broken into as many, or more ſmall parts, than thoſe of the turret on the Royal-Exchange, which he has very juſtly condemned. 'Tis ſtrange, that he could ſee that fault in the Exchange, and not in this church. If I may be free, I much doubt if he ever obſerved either; having very probably gathered the defect of the former, from the common report, which has been long ſince made of that error.

XVI. Alderſ-gate is a real Gothic heap of ſtone, with very little form, and worſe order. 'Tis ſtrong, and may do the office of a gate, to cloſe up the entrance into that part of the city; but if that was not regarded, 'twould be a prudent act to take it away entirely, and lay the ſtreet open. The figure of king JAMES I. on horſeback, is indeed in its attitude ſomething awkward, as our Critic deſcribes it; but the horſe has been in its time an excellent piece of ſculpture. The whole is now very much defaced and broken, and is a mezzo relievo, not a bas relief, as he calls it. —— And as the generality of my readers may not underſtand the difference between bas relievo and mezzo relievo; I ſhall ſubjoin the following ſhort explanation. A bas-relievo is a ſculptured repreſentation of a head, buſto, ſtatue, &c. on a plain or curved ſuperficies; whoſe ſubſtance projects above the ſurface of the plain, leſs than one half of its natural thickneſs: a mezzo-relievo is that, whoſe body projects exactly half: and all other figures, projecting more, are called alt relievo.

XVII. Shaftsbury-houſe in Alderſgate-ſtreet, by our Critic ſaid to be 'a moſt delightful fine edifice, that de-'clares the maſterly hand of INIGO JONES', is, in fact, one of the moſt abſurd buildings about town. For tho' its front is divided by Ionic pillaſters, ſupporting an entablature, which hath charmed Mr. Critic's eye; yet, the upper windows breaking through the architrave, into the freeze; the two outer pillaſters, much within, inſtead of being at the extreams of the front; the entablature beyond them to the extreams with falſe bearings; the pediment over the principal windows broken, for the ſake of introducing a ſhield and coronet; and the volutas of the capitals, loaded with heavy, clumſy feſtoons of fruits; render the whole a very ill conſidered front, much below the character of INIGO JONES.

XVIII. 'The new church in Old-ſtreet, (in our Critic's opinion) ſo ſlight and trifling, that it is not 'worth the trouble of a viſit', pag. 15. is more juſtly eſteemed by others ſtrong and ſubſtantial, and particularly its obelisk: which, had its altitude been but half as much again as it is, would have been an elegant piece of architecture.

XIX. I muſt not ſtay long near this edifice (which, being the only one of the kind in this kingdom, deſerves ſome applauſe) for by this time my Critic has reached Smithfield: where, inſtead of erecting a noble hall for the ſame purpoſe that Hick's-hall is now uſed, ſupported by a ſpacious piazza, beneath which, in bad weather, people might tranſact their affairs clean and dry, &c. he is for raiſing an obelisk, pyramid or ſtatue, in the centre, for the admiration of graziers, butchers, drovers, &c.

XX. 'The entrance into the hoſpital of St. Bartholo-'mew (ſays he) is in a taſte not altogether amiſs, but ſo 'erroneous, in point of proportion, that it rather of-'fends than entertains.' I wiſh Mr. Critic had explained himſelf a little better, in point of proportion, that I need not have had the trouble of examining this building for the diſcovery thereof.—In the firſt place, I obſerve, that the whole conſiſts of a Corinthian pediment, ſuſtained by two pillaſters, ſtanding on a ruſticated baſement, with a niche and ſtatue of Henry VIIIth, and too many windows between them. As to the pillaſters and pediment, which are the principal parts, no fault can be found with them, being true according to order: but the intercolumnation is too great, for ſingle columns; and therefore the pediment ſhould have been ſupported by double pillaſters; the niche larger and plain; and (if windows could not have been avoided) there ſhould have been one on either ſide of the niche, in the Venetian manner, with two circular ones over them, in the upper ſtory. As this pediment demands a ſupport of double pillaſters, if our Critic had been judge enough to ſee it; he would have recommended them, as he has done, to the porticos in the ruſticated wings of Greenwich Hoſpital. That the Hoſpital itſelf is 'intirely detached from 'the entrance, and in a manner ſtifled with the circumja-'cent houſes', is undoubtedly a very great injury, to the nobleneſs of the deſign; and certainly, could an opening have been made from the preſent front, capable to receive quadrangular colonades on each ſide, with an open palliſſade of iron, extending from the one to the other, the new building muſt have had a very magnificent aſpect.

XXI. Newgate has for many years been a priſon for thieves and debtors, as being the county goal for Middleſex. As it is one of the principal entrances into the city, 'twas neceſſary to embelliſh it with decent ornaments, which might allude to both purpoſes. The motto of the dial was remarkable, viz. UT FUR VENIO, I come as a thief. And indeed, Old Time has here played the thief's part, for he has ſtole away every letter of the motto.

XXII. The College of phyſicians in Warwick-lane, tho' badly ſituated, is magnificent within, ſome few particulars excepted, of which the moſt material are theſe. 1. That all the pillaſters are of too mean a projection; whereby they don't expreſs that majeſty they would do, were their projections greater. 2. That the architrave of the upper entablature is interrupted by circular windows, which break into it; and, what is worſe, the architrave, in compliance therewith, breaks back into the freeze. To remedy this, a baſement ſhould have been placed under the baſis of the order, which would have raiſed the architrave clear of the windows. 3. The intercolumnation of the frontiſpiece, being much too wide for the order, has more of the Tuſcan, than the Ionic aſpect; as have the columns themſelves, which are much too ſhort for the Ionic order. And the key ſtone of the arch is crowned with the ſame capital as the columns themſelves; which is ſomething very much out of the common way of finiſhing thoſe ornaments, and the firſt of the kind I ever ſaw.

XXIII. Methinks, I ſhould ſeem a ſtranger to the public buildings of this city, if (like our Critic) I proceed immediately to the Old Bailey; without once taking notice, that Chriſt's church, by Newgate-ſtreet, is a building of very great deſign, and worthy of the artiſt's obſervation.

XXIV. The Juſtice-hall in the Old Bailey, I muſt own, is not ſo magnificently contrived as it might have been; nor can I think the theatrical form, recommended by our Critic, would ſuit the purpoſe ſo well, as if the plan thereof was one half of an octagon, having the diameter in front, and ſide, parallel thereto for the bench. Then the oblique ſides would receive the jury-men on the right and left of the court; the area before them, the council, priſoner, &c. and the other two ſides, the witneſſes, ſpectators, &c. The bench, or throne for the court, ſhould be elevated conſiderably higher than the area; to be aſcended by circular ſteps, and covered with a canopy, ſupported by Caryatides, repreſenting Juſtice and Mercy. To the front of this hall ſhould be affixed a Doric colonade, of columns not leſs than four feet diameter; and inſtead of enriching the freeze of its entablature with triglyphs and metops of ox ſculls, as is generally (but moſt wrongly) done, I would introduce emblematical figures, alluding to judgment, puniſhment, &c.

The Xth Ode of ANACREON.

LOVE's form, with no great art compos'd
In wax, to ſale a youth expos'd.
Pray, what's the loweſt price, I cry'd?
In Doric tone he ſtrait reply'd,
What will you give? Few words I'll make:
At your own price the figure take.
Privy to all you ſhall be made;
To work in wax is not my trade:
But I can't bear with one to live,
Who ſtill craves more, the more I give.
For one ſole drachm then give him me:
A pretty bed-fellow he'll be.
LOVE, melt me ſoon with fierce deſire;
Or ſoon I'll melt thee in the fire.

From the PEGASUS in Grub-street.

THO' the following letter be written in defence of many of our professed enemies, we did not think ourselves at liberty to suppress it. If the way of reasoning in it be not altogether conclusive, as we do not think it is; the author of the Poem may make himself ample amends by exposing it.

Sir, it would be needless to enumerate all the qualifications of a satyrist, to so compleat a judge as Mr. BAVIUS. I shall therefore only take notice of one, immedately necessary, and which may be look'd upon as a sine quâ non. I mean, that the satyrist ought to know how to distinguish satyr from praise, and not mean one thing, and express another. To illustrate this, I must cite the author, or rather the work, (for the author chuses to attack in a mask) which gave birth to that reflection, viz. The Dramatick-Sessions, or Stage-Contest.

The ingenious writer of this piece has collected together the names of almost all the gentlemen, now living, who have attempted any thing in the dramatic-way, with a design to expose their characters, or performances. In order to this, he makes the Goddess of nonsense go to Covent-garden Theatre, and introduces a great number of candidates for the crown, whom she rejects. The consequence to be drawn from this, is, that they are not qualify'd to wear it. — A compliment instead of a satyr. Had this wise satyrist brought the God of wit down, and made him reject the candidates to his crown, he had indeed called them a parcel of blockheads in a very genteel pretty way. ——— But he still blunders on, and by making the Goddess declare the crown is only to be given to a blockhead (which she does in two or three places) he acknowledges (unawares I dare say) the candidates rejected are not blockheads enough to wear the crown. —— Nor is this all; he is not only mistaken in the choice of his Goddess, but likewise makes her speak quite out of character. It would be endless to quote the lines; the reader by applying the following remark as he reads the poem, will easily point out the places himself, viz. 'That nothing can justify the making the Goddess of 'nonsense speak either wittily, sensibly, or ironically. If therefore there is either, wit, sense, or irony in any of her speeches, it is a contradiction in terms. ——— If there is not, who is most hurt, the satyrist, or the satyrized.

Not to detain you any longer, Mr. BAVIUS, as I don't care to interfere with this gentleman's disposition of the crown, and yet think him highly deserving of some such honourable badge of distinction himself, if he will be so good as to leave his direction with you, I shall immediately after send him a fool's cap, leaving holes for his own ears to make their proper appearance, which I am confident will fit him, at least as well as his crown any of those, whom his vanity may make him rank among

TOM ever jovial, ever gay,
To appetite a slave,
Still whores and drinks his life away,
And laughs to see me grave.

So different is our whim:
The fellow fondly laughs at me;
And I could cry for him.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THURSDAY, Aug. 1. —— Paris, Aug. 7. An account comes from Villegouge in Bourdeaux, of the death of the famous John Princiteau, in his 103d year, who, 'till just before he dy'd, never knew sickness, tho' a noted tipler. C. —— Master of a vineyard near Bourdeaux. 'Tis remarkable he was never known to be either sick or sober. DA. —I suppose he drank only Bourdeaux claret.

FRIDAY, Aug. 2. —— Brussels, Aug. 3. There flies a very improbable rumour, That the states of the Empire have utterly protested against the Russians coming into the Empire; which 'tis doubted must be the only remedy left to drive them away. C.

Paris, Aug. 7. The king of Sardinia's general quarters are at San Beneditto: the marshal de Coigni is advanced to the banks of the Secchia, and has fixed his quarters in cassines over-against Quistello. The count de Konigsegg's general quarters are at Quingentoli. DP.

SATURDAY, Aug. 3. —— Paris, July 31. When the king was told, the queen was brought to bed of a princess, he answered, 'I am very glad of it; and since 'she is come in a time of triumphing, her name shall 'be Victoria. P.

Gibraltar, June 26. The Spaniards have finished the new fortifications, which they have raised against this town, and in the bay, and planted them with heavy cannon. ——We are now busy in making some new fortifications in an old castle, which are to be provided with 30 brass cannon. P. — Odd work in time of peace.

MONDAY, Aug. 5. ——— Dantzick, July 31. All the Polish lords, who were forced to surrender, (before they were admitted to the king's audience) were desired to come to a private conference; where it was proposed to them to take an oath, according to the form then read. They answered, that they were ready to acknowledge Augustus for their king; but as this oath contain'd matters which they judg'd contrary to their honour, their conscience, and their privileges, they could not sign the same. This occasioned a debate of several hours: in which it having been represented to them in the strongest terms, that there was no other way to obtain the king's favour, they all resolved to take it, except the Starost Metscski and Rosalinski, [Merschki. P. DP. DJ. DA.] both of the house of Sapicha. It was proposed to the palatines of Pomerelia and Marienburg, and to the other senators, &c. of the provinces adhering to king Stanislaus, to make a confederacy in favour of king Augustus, which they immediately approved and signed. Then they were introduced to the king, and invited to dine with him. C. &c. — A case of necessity!

Private letters from Prussia mention, that king Stanislaus resided there in good health, at the castle of Johannesburg, and was treated, by order of his Prussian majesty, with a proper dignity. DP.

TUESDAY, Aug. 6. They write from Rome, that the eldest son of the Chevalier de St. George, as likewise the prince of Morocco, who some time ago embrac'd the Christian Religion, were on the road, in order to make their campaign in the Spanish army before Gaeta. DA.
